

11 reasons why you should not buy a research paper

If you are currently a student at university — whether it is for an undergraduate or graduate degree — chances are you have a research paper that will be due soon, and that it will either lobotomize or save your final grade. As someone who is swamped with studies, you have reached a last minute fork in your road during the infamous finals week, and thus are beginning to ask yourself whether or not buying a research paper might be the way to go. Let me give you some advice: don't.

1

Plagiarism

This is the biggest, if not most crucial reason why you should not even be tempted by the thought of buying a research paper online. Too often those papers are filled with plagiarized material, and the consequences for plagiarism are severe.

2

The Paper itself is Not that Good

Companies that sell research papers are good at one thing: selling their product. That does not always mean they deliver in the quality department; they just have to sell you one. Even so, their papers are not only full of plagiarized material, but the content is just poor.

3

The Paper Will Not Match the Specific Criteria of the Assignment

This writer of this paper you are buying is not the one taking the class. How do they know how to write the assignment per the professor's precise instructions? It is more than likely the paper will turn out to be off-topic, and entirely inferior to anything you write yourself..

4

Bought Research Papers are Regurgitated Material

Usually these papers are not only filled with plagiarism, but the content, phrases, and even whole paragraphs have potentially been used in more than one paper. The writers of these papers regurgitate their material. Both your professor and plagiarism software will be able to pick up on this.

5

It Costs Too Much

Have you seen the price tag on those papers? You are a poor university student. You cannot afford to buy a 'dodgy' research paper for the sake of one night's sleep. You know how little money you have. Do not waste it on something that will inevitably cost you a lot more than just a few dollars. Be wise, and remember that the costs are not just financial.

6

You Will Get Caught

This is the obvious one isn't it? Unfortunately for you, chances are your professor has seen it before. Your professor has made a living out of performing research in their field. Not only that, they have already seen some of your work before, and will know from the diction of the paper it is not your own. Additionally, they have software to scan your paper and search it for plagiarism. Either way, you will get caught.

7

Consequences When You Do Get Caught

When you get caught, and you will, not only will you fail the class, but you could also be subject to something even worse: you could get kicked out of school. Once you have been caught and charged with academic fraud this incident will go on your record and stay there. Other universities and companies alike will scrutinize you henceforth.

8

Developing Bad Habits

As a student passing off someone else's work as your own, nothing could be more corrupt to not only your education, but also your future. The habits you develop as a student will stay with you into your adult years. If you quit, then you will surely lose, not just now in the form of your grade, but years down the road when there is more at risk than just your final grade.

9

You Will Not Learn

Buying a research paper does damage to your future and your education. Years from now you could use what you learn to achieve something in your career. That being said, you would have missed out on an opportunity to learn something that would have inevitably helped you long-term – not just in the moment of finishing the class.

10

You Will Not Have Time to Learn Later

Do not squander your freedom to learn now. You will not have such freedom again. After university, life happens. Soon you will be swept up with the tide and carried off, and the ability to learn something you could have devoted a precious amount of time to in university will be gone with it. Use that time now.

11

It is Not Worth the Risk

Buying a research paper is simply not worth the risk. It might seem like only a paper now, but years down the road, you can either regret the decision of buying one, or enjoy knowing you accomplished a task that has helped you on to achieve other larger, more impacting goals. Take this opportunity and learn. You will never regret that decision.