

Measuring the Impact of Your Research

Author
Enago Academy

Post Url
<https://www.enago.com/academy/measuring-the-impact-of-your-research/>

How Can You Measure the Impact of Your Research?

H-index
An h-index of 40 means that a researcher has published at least 40 articles that have received at least 40 citations each.

H-index can also be calculated for institutes and countries!

G-index
A g-index of 30 means that a researcher has published at least 30 article and when combined received at least 900 citations.

i10-index
An i10-index of 20 means that a researcher has 20 articles that have received at least 10 citations each.

Download the app now to know how to promote your research effectively!

@Enago enagoacademy enago.com/academy enago.com/app

Citation metrics provide a way to quantitatively measure the impact, quality, and significance of published research. These journal-level, author-level, and article-level metrics are considered to be indicative of the readership and popularity of the work.

To learn more about different citation metrics, click here.

How Can You Measure the Impact of Your Research?

H-index

An h-index of 40 means that a researcher has published at least 40 articles that have received at least 40 citations each.

G-index

A g-index of 30 means that a researcher has published at least 30 articles and when combined received at least 900 citations.

i10-index

An i10-index of 20 means that a researcher has 20 articles that have received at least 10 citations each.

H-index can also be calculated for institutes and countries!

Download the app now to know how to promote your research effectively!

 @Enago

 enagoacademy

 enago.com/academy

 enago.com/app

Cite this article

Enago Academy, Measuring the Impact of Your Research. Enago Academy. 2018/06/15. <https://www.enago.com/academy/measuring-the-impact-of-your-research/>